Monkton Mill is a two storey brick structure on a stone ground storey, the latter being entirely above grade on the front (north) and partly below grade on the back. Three bays in width by two in depth, it has a gabled roof, plain corbeled brick cornice, and 6/6 windows with expessed wood lintels. Centered in the east end is a door in each of four storeys; the hoist beam is sheltered by a small extension of the roof. The deteriorating iron overshot wheel is on the south side; remains of the millrace may be seen above, and the tail race goes under the mill, thence underground is a stone-walled conduit with stone slabs supporting the turf above, to a point of discharge several hundred feet west of the mill, behind the Miller's house.

Bricks are in common bond, with every seventh course headers.

The entire interior is framed in straight sawn material, all exposed. A girder, supported by chamfered columns, parallel to the roof ridge, supports the joists, which span from the south wall to the north. Each storey is similarly framed. In the mortheast corner of the second storey (the first brick storey) a small office is partitioned off, fully lathed and plastered. A single-flue chimney rises from this corner. Lathing is circular sawn, attached with cut mails. Rafters, exposed in the fourth or attic storey, are half-kapped and pinned at the ridge.

Some of the mill's works survive, in situ.

The Menkton Mill is one of several brick structures in Menkton, all of similar construction, and probably dating from the same period, conjectured to be in the decade following the Civil War. The most obvious similarities are their brickwork, their exposed wood lintels, and their 6/6 windows.

James T. Wellen, Jr.

The Miller's house is a rectangular two storey brick house above a high stone foundation, three bays in length, one room in depth. A one storey porch extends across the principal or east front, facing the mill, at the first floor level. An unmoulded four-panel door is centered between 6/6 windows with louvred blinds and exposed wood lintels.

In its detailing, the Miller's House is identical to the adjacent mill, and was undoubtedly built at the same time.

James T. Wollon, Jr.
